JOB's ADVERT- short deadline!

Archaeological Science 3-year postdoc at Teesside University- deadline 11th January

A new and exciting three-year position investigating Roman archaeological leather.

The PELLIS project will investigate the economic and manufacturing history of the Roman provinces and frontiers, specifically aiming to enhance our understanding of the leather economy in the Roman Empire. The project aims to combine scientific and humanistic approaches to explore leather preservation and processing of hides in the Roman world, as well as to establish sex and species origin of the leather used in a range of objects. We expect results to lead to greater understanding of herd management and agricultural practices, regional trade networks, raw materials exploitation, and possibly the socio-economic factors surrounding the use of animals in the Roman period.

The team welcomes applications from those with broad experience and background- either archaeology or science are fine!

Apply now with a real simple form- short deadline of the 11th of January 2026!
